Poems, Short Stories, Songs and Quotes Charles Ullian

I have spent my life working hard with my hands, to earn a meager living. My intellectual thirst has been quenched through my observation of life and subsequent discoveries.

My spiritual thirst has been quenched by the love from my children and their mothers, as well as from the two remarkable people whose undying love brought me into this world and continued to bathe me in unconditionally, until this very day, long since their passing. I am fortunate to have a twin brother and to have shared in the unique love and closeness found in twins, for my entire life.

“I have discovered that it is possible to carry something positive away from every encounter in life. Sometimes we cannot see that treasure immediately. Sometimes we cannot see it for a long time. But knowing that it is possible, keeps painful confrontation and uncertainty from crippling us, while we wait for life to deliver those treasures in due time.”

It is not the calm, balmy days that make an oak tree strong, but rather the turbulent, strong winds of mighty storms that bend and break its branches. Such is the case with all living things, including those of us who try to put the breath of our lives into written works.

I hope that I have written something that will entertain, please, or stimulate you in some way.
