Are Laurel's visions madness or could they be inspired by God?

Laurel Fischer knows the trials of having a prophetic gift all too well. Her husband, Frank, had believed her when she saw they'd have their daughter, Grace. He staked everything on it when she foretold his election to city council. But when a vision revealed that Frank was in the arms of another woman? Frank's politics took a turn. He divorced Laurel. He used her visions to prove her an unfit mother. He'd wed his wealthy mistress, Shana--a woman with everything but the child she'd always wanted.

When a disturbing new vision precedes the councilman's slaying, Laurel seems a likely suspect. The harder Laurel fights to get Grace back, the more that spells motive to hard boiled Detective McTier. It's all the more ammo for Frank's widow, Shana, to fight Laurel for custody.

Reluctant rag sheet reporter, Joe Hardisty, is pegged to cover the story, focusing on Laurel's visionary gift. A legit journalist at heart, Joe balks at the sensational angle. Since his brother was once abused by a priest, the last person Joe is inclined to trust is another supposed emissary of God. Fresh off a failed relationship with his editor, Debra Bernet, the only female he'll cozy up to is his cat.

As skeptical about romantic relationships as he is about matters of faith, Joe's walls are high, but the enigmatic Laurel has a way of unearthing Joe's most closely guarded secrets. Could Laurel's visions be genuinely inspired by God? A forbidden romance blossoms as this psychological thriller unfolds, while detectives close in on a killer.

Which mother will prevail in the custody battle for Grace?

Can Joe return to the faith he knew as a child?

Will Laurel survive to find love again?
